The Bottom Line

A Greek restaurant owner in Toledo had his own bookkeeping system. He kept his accounts payable in a shoe box to the left of his cash register, his daily cash returns in the cash register and his receipts for bills paid in another shoe box on the right.

When his youngest son graduated as a certified public accountant, he was appalled by his father's primitive methods. "I don't know how you can run your business this way," he said. "How do you know what your profits are?"

"Well, son," the father responded, "when I got off the boat from Greece, I had nothing but the pants I was wearing. Today, your brother is a doctor. You are an accountant. Your sister is a psychologist. Your mother and I have a new car, a house in the city and a cottage on the lake. We have a good business, and everything is paid for. So, you add all that together, subtract the pants, and there's your profit."
